PROGRAM DESCRIPTION

The U.S. Department of Health and Human Services reports that one-third of children entering foster care are zero to three years of age, with 15 percent being infants under age one. A recent explosion of scientific research has provided new insights into the complex social, emotional, and intellectual development that unfolds during a child's earliest years. Despite their special vulnerability, too many young children seen by courts in child abuse or neglect cases or other custody matters do not receive services that can address and ameliorate risks to their early development. Participants who attend this one-day training will hear from national and state experts on the most current permanency and early intervention issues and practices for infants, toddlers, and preschoolers involved with the court system through child protective proceedings. The day will include a complement of panels and individual speakers that will provide both a national and a crucial Michigan perspective.

The training will begin with a session by a clinical development psychologist, demonstrating why judges, attorneys, and other child welfare professionals must carefully consider the early development of infants and toddlers. The session will explain some of the recent scientific findings about early infant development and will provide the framework for the remainder of the day. Infant mental health experts will focus on the importance of parents forming healthy attachment relationships with infants and toddlers and discuss the implications for visitation with infants and toddlers in foster care.

A panel of Michigan infant mental health experts will provide specifics about essential early intervention services, including services provided under Part C of the Individuals with Disabilities Education Act (IDEA). An experienced judge from a specialized infant-toddler court will provide the legal framework for meeting the needs of infants and toddlers in foster care. The afternoon will conclude with a panel discussion of new and innovative court and community collaborations, including specialized court programs that improve outcomes for infants and toddlers.

Through the federal Child and Family Services Review process, Michigan is evaluated on how well it provides for safety, permanency, and well-being for foster children. This training will provide DHS workers and private agency caseworkers with the skills essential for improving the outcomes for very young children placed in state care. It also will provide judges, attorneys, and other child welfare professionals with comparably vital information to inform and change their practices.
